

Usually, at a Tharinos, a group is capable of travelling into the Glamour to take part in a scene or circumstance that has happened in the past. In that way they can take lessons from the past, learn secrets long forgotten and use both of these to better their position in the world. This time however the power of the glamour was so weak that the Fae present, instead, put on a play that they thought would aid the Charter in their efforts against the Iron Mark.

Whilst I am led to believe that this play was ridiculous, to say the least, the knowledge that was imparted was quite intent and could be relayed thusly:

Our Charter took on the roles of Druids of the Earth Tribes, led by Dunedain, just before the coming of the Nexus when the Tribes were evacuating into the world. The Druids that they were portraying had been dispatched to the outlying groups to give them warning and encourage them to leave the Land of the Chosen as well. As they took up the role they had travelled far to an isolated location where they encountered a family who were introduced, as best as I can untangle, thusly:

There was Alakaran and his family who were of The Brythoran tribe which tended sheep and goats in the mountain slopes. Essentially a private and peaceful people they sought to avoid contact with the other clans but paid their tribute to the Skagriagaard as all clans did. The family was described as large and, well, silly: Stake - Head of his family, an old man (this was emphasised) who has seen and witnessed the deeds of the Skagriagaard and tells tales of how his brother was chosen to be one of them but did not return from the battle with void.

Shok - His wife and defender of the family, fearsome warrior and hand fasted to him from the The Ganimies. They were a people of the plains. They were wordy and were proud of the basketry that they wove and the herds of cattle they reared. His brother Tenspears who is much younger and next leader of the clan, he and his wife are the proud parents to a youngling called Palyantor His wife Aksakl who is wed to Medsada and is the mother to the young Fes Stake and Shok's son Vokes - Who is a burly bruiser of around 20 years of age who believed that he could do anything.

The Brythoran at this time, like many others, have heard of the coming of the comet and fear for what to do next. They intended to rely on the gillieabad to protect them and were in the midst of preparing a ritual when a group of Kalasaski took Vokes to use in their own ritual of protection. Kalasaski was a name given to things that escaped from a celestial prison called the void; they were a half human abomination from back in the day. They had taken him to their own camp where they intend to eat him in a ritual to their own savage powers in a hope to survive the oncoming holocaust.

Meanwhile Duinedan and his retinue were visiting various camps and warning people to find shelter in sacred places whilst delivering the message that the heroes of the Skagriagaard were already escorting the majority of the Earth Tribes to safety in distant lands. Ostensibly Duinedan was sent to warn those trapped at the outskirts in the hope that they might survive. He arrived, passed on the message, and then helped the family retrieve the boy in a heroic battle against wicked beasts. However, during the battle, which the druids won, an enemy Kalasaki mutated it's form and became that of the Ironmark.

There was a terrible battle at this point I am led to believe and the terror was powerful which led to a disruption of this tale. It was a close thing in which the Charter came close to losing the lesson that they were participating in. Fortunately, the rescuing of the Herald of Tharinos allowed it to drive the presence of the Ironmark from the glamour. All of this points directly to the fear that the revelation of the lesson was to the Iron Mark.

The family congratulated everyone, the Charter included, on a battle well fought as though they had all fought their battle together. With the child rescued though the narrator continued the story, the golden light was coming from the sky, so the Charter continued on until they arrived at the cave. They entered the cave where they spoke with the Gillieabad that would one day be called Whinathar and they received prophetic statements about the future of their family and the world. This was basically along the lines that the family in this cave would one day become the Winter Family, infused with the power of the Comet and joined to the Whinathar Gillieabad, the Comet shortly after struck the cave, ending the scene.